The delegates to both conventions insisted upon having the head of the ticket, the citizens especially being determined to have the naming of the man. There were many Democrats in the citizens convention, and it was a bitter pill for them to have to swallow a Republican for representative, but they did it, and Jacob Miller, a tried and true g. o. p. man, became the fushon nominee. It required four hours of committee work to decide this question, and after that all was clear sailing. The Republicans took their choice of the county officers, and allowed the fusionists, or citizens, or non-partisans, as they are variously styled, to name the others. The whole matter was arranged to the entire satisfaction of the Republicans, and the wonder is that men of good judgment, such as were in the citizens' convention, could be blinded and duped in such a way as they were. The Democrats who, because of local conditions in Bountiful, entered the citizens' movement, were, it seemed, simply led whither the Recause of local conditions in Bountiful, entered the citizens' movement, were, it seemed, simply led whither the Recause of local conditions in Bountiful, entered the citizens' movement, were, it seemed, simply led whither the Redelegates to both conventions inentered the citizens' movement, were, it seemed, simply led whither the Re-publicans desired them to go. The Republican convention was called o order at 18:45 by County Chairman esse M. Smith of Layton, who read the call. Ephraim P. Ellison was elected as temporary chairman and William L. A committee of five, consisting of Jesse M. Smith, Amos Cook, John A. Hatch, Levi Tay-lor, ir., and J. J. indeed, Meakin and Raugh being the only ones who received anything like a hearty reception.

Orson Smith presided. Professor J. P. Meakin was introduced at the commencement of the meeting, and recited.

Mr. Eldredge was then presented, and his reception was depidedly frosty. There were a few spasmodic handcians, and a little stamping, but not enough to be heard outside the building. He began by attempting to eliminate the sliver issue from the campaign, as he did at Hyrum yesterday. Then he drifted into taiking about confidence in the stability of the government and told of how much of the country's business was done on the basis of public confidence; told of how the lack of confidence in the Pemocratic party had caused the panics which we have recently suffered; told a pitful tale of sed scenes he had witnessed in Salt Lake during 1885, and charged the Democratic party with being responsible for them. He dragged in a lot of heavy metaphors, comparing the Democratic party to an old unseaworthy halk, and the Republican party to the battleship Oregon. He mentioned lead, wool and sheep, but he avoided all reference to wheat. His whole speech was like a wet banket thrown over the audience, and he took his seat with but very little enthusiasm being manifested. Meakin called for ten times the amount of applause Eldredge did.

JUDGE BAGLEY. JUDGE BAGLEY.

JUDGE BAGLEY.

Judge Bagiey was next introduced and he received quite as cool a reception as Eldredge. He commenced by booming Zans, placing great atress upon the qualifications necessary for supreme judge. Zane's name was received in silemos. He dwelt upon the qualifications necessary for supreme judge. Zane's name was received in silemos. He dwelt upon the qualifications of congressman, and argued that we should not care how handsome a man is or how well acquainted we are with him. He eniogized kidredge, whose name was received every time with profound silence.

He claimed that a Republican could and would help silver as much as a Democrat. He admitted that the Democrats made silver the paramount issue, but having been beaten on that issue, he argued it ought not be an issue. He mentioned and chuckled in high glee over the action of the New York Democracy, but carefully avoided mentioning Bryan's name. The halance of his speech was chiefly devoted to the tariff question.

Mr. Frank Baugh then sang "The Star Spangled Banner," and Meakin recited again.

JOHN HENRY'S EFFORT.

JOHN HENRY'S EFFORT.

John Henry was then introduced, and the same chilly reception was accorded him. He said he! leved Basisht to be an honest, learned lawyer, but thought Zane a better man, though he did not give his reasons. Roberts he characterized as a literary man and Eldredge as a practical man of affairs. Roberts, he said, was an out and out free trader, and that was his reason for opposing him. He maintained that the Wilson bill opened the factories of England and closed those in the United States, and tried to bolster up this argument with figures which no ene could understand. Frotection he pronounced the one great leasue of the campaign. He maintained that Japan will be one of our most serious commercial rivals, and hence we must have a protective tariff in order to prevent her advance upon us. To attempt to change the basis of the government policy from a protective one to that advocated by the Democrats, he held, placed us in danger of revolution. He commended the management of the war, commended the management of the war, and said that thousands of volunteers were perhaps never fed so well before as they were in the United States army.

This closed one of the most miserable fixies for a political meeting that was ever held here.

The chaplain did not state that the admiral reported himself within the four mile limit, Witness said he believed the chaplain said something to the effect that the audience was as much entitled to prize money as Admiral Sampson.

Senator Schermerhorn, on cross examination, stated that he had known Chaplain McIntyre for several years and regarded him as a personal friend. He was of the opinion that Chaplain McIntyre was ill at the time of the lecture and that he should have been more explicit in some of his statements. Joshua Wilson, a dry goods salesman, testified that Chaplain McIntyre stated that the materials and workmanship in the construction of the Oregon were the best, while those in eastern built vessels were inferior because the contracts were secured through political influence. At the afternoon session Judge E. N. Bonflis, a newspaper colling testified.

Finally, when there were more vessels to build than the eastern manufactur-ers could handle, the San Francisco company received a contract. The company spared no pains to make the Oregon the best ship ever built. Regarding the battle, witness quoted Chaplain MeIntyre as saying that as the Oregon was going in she passed the Iowa, adding in a humorous manner: "And where was Fighting Bob'

Chaplain McIntyre, the witness continued, said something about the division of prize money, naming $10,000 as the amount to go to Admiral Sampson and $500 to Captain Clark, but there was nothing said about the audience being entitled to as much as Sampson. Witness declared the report published in the Rocky Mountain News, upon which the charges against the chaplain are largely based, to be decidedly unjust to the chaplain. He denied its correctness in many points, Judge Bonfils was still on the stand when the court adjourned for the day.
